POLLING METHODOLOGY

For this poll, a landline sample of likely households (based on recent general election participation) for an automated poll was chosen from the population registered to vote in the state of Alabama, and there were 500 completed responses to eight poll questions.

The survey was conducted September 30-October 1. The margin of error, with a 95% confidence interval, was 4.4%. The demographic breakdown of the respondents was 75-24% white/black, while the geographic breakdown (as defined by Nielsen Designated Market Area, or DMA) of the respondents was as follows: 41% from Birmingham, 5% from Dothan, 20% from Huntsville, 16% from Mobile, and 18% from Montgomery (The explanation of the boundaries of these regions is graphically depicted in Exhibit A at the end of the poll analysis).

SUMMARY

JMC Analytics and Polling independently conducted this poll for the Alabama U.S. Senate special election. There are three main takeaways from this poll: (1) Roy Moore starts off with a comfortable lead, but he is not at or above 50% in the ballot test, (2) the slim margin by which respondents prefer a generic Republican candidate (in a state Donald Trump carried 62-34% last year) should be of some concern to Republicans both in Alabama and nationally, (3) while an absolute majority of voters believe that Roy Moore is qualified to be a U.S. Senator, it is a slim 50% majority.

While Donald Trump carried Alabama by an overwhelming 62-34% margin last year, the softening of his approval ratings is also apparent in Alabama, where a 51% majority approves of his job performance (41% disapprove, while 8% are undecided). This is an issue where there is substantial polarization not only on a racial basis (whites approve 65-28%, while blacks disapprove 80-5%), but also on a gender (men approve of the President's job performance 58-36%, while it's a 45-45% tie among women) and an age basis (while those 65 or older approve of the President 57-35%, those under 65 disapprove 47-44%).

The ballot tests show Roy Moore in decent shape, but he still faces a competitive race, particularly since respondents are only narrowly inclined to support a "generic" Republican candidate. To illustrate, Republican Roy Moore has a 48-40% lead over Democrat Doug Jones, while a narrower 49-45% plurality prefers a Republican candidate. When these two numbers are crosstabbed against the Trump approval numbers, a clearer picture of partisan polarization is apparent: Those who approve of President Trump support a Republican by a near unanimous 86-9%, while Moore is favored by a near identical 83-7%. Those who disapprove of President Trump's job performance favor a Democratic candidate 90-6% while favoring Doug Jones by a slightly lower 83-8%.

Where Republicans nationally and Roy Moore specifically need to be a bit concerned is among those with no opinion of President Trump's performance: they favor a Republican 46-34%, but only favor Moore by a 34-27% margin, and 37% are undecided – this 37% represents the support Moore needs to win the general election.

In summary, Roy Moore starts off the general election campaign in good shape (his white evangelical base supports him 76-16%), but given the contentious Republican primary/runoff campaign and an apparently more energized Democratic electorate, he cannot take his election for granted.
